Charles Stewart Roberts : Stoking the Fire: A Surgical Memoir of London before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Stoking the Fire: A Surgical Memoir of London:

Between the summers of 1996 and 1997, after a decade of surgical training in the USA, Charles Stewart Roberts went to the Royal Brompton Hospital in London, to train in paediatric cardiac surgery under the distinguished consultant cardiothoracic surgeon, Christopher Lincoln. Lincoln describes surgical training as "stoking the fire"; tending it for a sufficient period of time, to grow accustomed to its heat. Roberts' personal memoir of his experience in London, inside and outside the hospital, is an account of surgical training under Lincoln, a personal insight about the surgical profession, as well an American perspective on life in England.

"This book is the most extraordinary book I have read. "The book charts the author's year in England - where he stayed, where he ate, what ward rounds he attended, where he visited in the UK and abroad...again, his colleagues at work and his progress in the operating theater. "...I really enjoyed reading it. In fact, I read it twice and there is a lot that helps to improve Anglo-American relations....it may encourage you to be an author of perhaps your own memoirs."
