0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. History of surgery in America medical schools.By NanA well documented look at the medical education history of Georgetown, as well as, the evolving of medical practices and politics from the late 1800's to present and the men and women who made a difference.

This history of Georgetown University School of Medicine traces 150 years of revolutions in medical and surgical practice, education, and science. Today one of the nation's most respected institutions, the medical school began in four candlelit rooms with seven professors, a handful of students, a curriculum only four months long, and virtually no clinical instruction. Covering bloodletting to grave-robbing to the birth of the modern high-tech era, this history focuses on remarkable individuals, especially the surgeons among them, who overcame successive obstacles and dramas to drive Georgetown forward.

"A large cast of strong and colorful personalities . . . a lively and eminently readable account . . ." -- John C. Rose, M.D., Former Dean, Georgetown University School of Medicine
"A riveting account of the major role surgeons had in the evolution and development of the Georgetown Medical School . . ." -- LaSalle D. Leffall Jr., M.D., Howard University College of Medicine
"A strikingly distinctive work that actually delivers more than its subtitle promises." -- R. Emmett Curran, Professor of History, Georgetown University
About the Author
Patricia Barry is a native of Great Britain now living in the United States. In a long career in journalism, she has authored two previous books and worked as a reporter, columnist, and editor on British newspapers, including seven years as an investigative reporter and feature writer for the London Sunday Times. Although she majored in history at Durham University, England, this is her first historical title. She moved with her husband and three children to Maryland in 1985, and now works as a senior editor and writer specializing in healthcare for the AARP's newspaper in Washington, D.C.
